In 1987, a group of scientists and archaeologists gathered at an archaeological site in Giza. They were not planning to dig up anything. Instead, they watched a TV screen as a miniature camera was lowered through a hole in the ground. As the camera descended slowly into the narrow hole, the pieces of a wooden ship became visible. There were no plans to remove the ship from its burial chamber, so the tiny video camera filmed the whole area instead. Ever since the Royal Ship of Cheops was discovered in 1957, archaeologists had thought that there must be a sister ship.

Now at last, with the aid of the latest technological equipment, their theory was confirmed. The exact purpose of the ship is not certain. Some people suggest that it was built for carrying the spirits of the dead on their journey round the Earth with the sun god Ra' a. On the other hand, the boat may have been built for the journey through the underworld. Yet a third suggestion is that the boat was used to bring the pharaoh's body down the Nile to his burial place.

It was started in 1974 by a group of teachers. They often used to go to factories to ask for some of the rubbish that was being thrown away. They would get paper, fabric and other things to use in their art classes at school. Then they had the idea to start a shop and sell the rubbish they collected.
